Research Paper Revision Statement

According to the feedback to my research paper, I revised the paper based on three major issues: the “so what,” providing the context of Nanchang earlier, and the root problem for lower-income families. Also, sentence-level editing and minor structure change are also included.

For the “so what” question, I defined it as the problem lower-income people face in this paper, so I add a paragraph behind the 4.2 Educational non-equalization to discuss more about the situation of lower-income family students if their family cannot afford the school district housing.

As for the root problem for lower-income families, I add it to the thesis in the third paragraph of the introduction section. Like I mentioned in the “so what” question, I emphasized the question what it means for lower-income families in the last paragraph of section 4.2.

I considered moving the context of Nanchang to the introduction section, but later I felt I could not make a good transition here. So it is now section 2.1, before all the concepts were explained. I think it is early enough for readers to know about the city.

For the admission priority content, I used my words to paraphrase it and made it easy to understand with an example. Readers now do not need to read a long quote carefully and can understand how students are admitted to schools with the example provided.
